

Paul Henry back for second vintage

BROADCASTER PAUL Henry has again teamed up with Invivo to create the second vintage of his Pinot Noir – the first of which sold out in record time last year.

Invivo co-founder Tim Lightbourne says the first release of Paul Henry's Own Pinot Noir was so successful ("We've had people who missed out the first time contacting us on a daily basis") that three times the amount is available in this release – 24,000 bottles – after 8000 sold out in only a week last year.

Paul Henry's Own Pinot Noir was also critically acclaimed, with wine writer Michael Cooper writing in the Listener: "It's a skilfully crafted, mainstream style, worth cellaring, but already delicious."

Henry was again assisted by the Invivo team. Lightbourne says Henry's second stint at the blending bench has created a unique mix that features Central Otago Pinot Noir grapes from four of Invivo's top growers.

Glengarry's server crashed trying to cope with the unprecedented demand for the first vintage after its release in November 2016. Glengarry general manager, Liz Wheadon says, "In the history of our company, we have never seen such traffic volumes to our website in such a short space of time". Wheadon says it was Glengarry's most successful launch of an individual wine, ever.

Invivo also produces Graham Norton's Own wines with UK talk show host Graham Norton, and spearheaded New Zealand's first equity crowdfunded winery.
